

Transforming Intra-Africa Trade to Promote Investment, Economic Diversification and Inclusion

Intra-Africa trade has long held untapped potential for the continent's economic growth and resilience. As African countries strive for economic diversification, reducing dependency on raw material exports and fostering industrialisation remains a key objective. While traditionally focused on commodity exports, many African economies are now seeking to rethink their trade and investment patterns, moving toward value-added production and intra-regional trade that could unlock significant economic opportunity. However, realising this vision demands a renewed focus on the structural reforms and infrastructural investments necessary to integrate markets and create diverse and inclusive growth.
